Call for Nominations:

The teaching of economics at the undergraduate level requires a unique set of skills, including intellectual rigor and flexibility, a breadth and depth of knowledge about one's teaching subject, good humour, and a capacity for understanding, compassion and patience. With the support of the Economics Trust, the alumni, students, faculty and staff of the Queen's Economics Department recognize and celebrate excellence and dedication in the teaching of undergraduate economics with the QED Undergraduate Teaching Prize.

This prize is awarded annually to the individual who, through their involvement in the teaching of undergraduate economics at Queen's, has shown that they possess the skills required to excel in their role as instructor, mentor and motivator for their students. Any individual who has taught one or more undergraduate economics courses at Queen's during the past year is eligible for this prize. Alumni, students, faculty and staff are encouraged to nominate candidates for this prize. Nominations must include the name(s) of the person or persons submitting the nomination and a short letter in support of the nominee. Letters should be submitted to the Undergraduate Studies office (Dunning Hall Room 221) before May 1st.

The winner of the prize will be announced to the Department and its supporters at spring convocation. Financial recognition generously funded by the Economics Trust may accompany the prize.
